

Abstract: We study axiomatically complexity aversion in risky choice by relaxing the independence axiom for complexity aversion. We show that this characterizes an expected utility maximizer with an entropic cost of complexity or a power weighted expected utility maximizer that weights probabilities by a power function. Additionally, we extend the results to a general cost of complexity.